

As the number of radio and TV station owners plummets and the voices of opinion and viewpoints narrow and literally sound not just similar but identical, the public sees less of issues, of music and art, of beauty. Variety is the spice of life and America is becoming bland. Driving cross country on long trips and looking for local stations used to be a treat. Finding the local music stations used to reflect the local taste. The disk jockies were wonderfully unique - sometimes horrible, sometimes great. I just turn it off now.

I appeal to the Commission to take back the air waves for the public good. I see a meeting that will make a horrid decision while the public remains unaware and, well, blandly unconcerned.
